About the Lecture

The City Assembly House, the new headquarters of the Society, was built by the Society of Artists in Ireland between 1766 and 1771 with the aim of promoting the work of Irish artists and providing an academy for the arts. At the time of its construction it stood as the first purpose built public art gallery in either Britain or Ireland and possibly in Europe.

About the Speaker

Donough Cahill is the Executive Director of the Irish Georgian Society in Ireland. Based in Dublin, Donough oversees the delivery of the Irish Georgian Society's conservation, education and advocacy programs.

About The Irish Georgian Society

The Irish Georgian Society promotes awareness and protection of Ireland's architectural heritage and decorative arts. It achieves this through conservation projects that have saved many important historic buildings; through education programs that encompass seminars, publications and specialist tours; and through campaigning for the protection of endangered buildings.
